I soon realized that the remote repo didn't have my commit history. So I tried to get the "repo" to do a fetch and it got to this state `/create a new branch/ git checkout -b new_branch /edit file/ git add. git commit -m 'added a message'` And I checked out the remote branch. It got so far as this `/make a new commit on the remote branch/ git push origin new_branch` Then some time after that I made a change to another file. Then I went back to the remote branch. I saw that the commit number hadn't been changed so I figured the push was still in progress. But it wasn't. I took a look at the remote branch and realized that the remote repo didn't have my change. I then checked the local branch and realized that it had this commit number. My question is about what happened and what steps would I take to ensure that this doesn't happen again. My guess is that since it is a webhosting service I can try and trigger events from their control panels that would rebuild the entire repository. There are a couple of other services where I could perform a similar action. Is my guess correct, or would something much simpler be likely? A: I assume this is a self hosted Git repo. If so, you should be very surprised at what you're seeing, because it's not going to work like you expect. Basically, you should not really expect your local branch to stay in sync with the remote branch at all, even if you're making a push. Git is a 3da54e8ca3
