Therefore, as compared with the conventional approach for fabricating the sensing portions and the control elements in three layers using different masks, the photosensor array of this invention is more accurate and more reliable in the fabrication. In accordance with the present invention, the photosensor array of this invention is made of a first semiconductor substrate, wherein at least one photosensing portion is formed on a first surface of the first substrate. The first semiconductor substrate comprises at least one first photodiodes and at least one first channel selection transistor. The first photosensing portion comprises a plurality of first photodiodes arranged in a first pixel array, with each of the first photodiodes having an associated first channel selection transistor for controlling the electrical connection between the first photosensing portion and a common output line for receiving a photoelectric signal from the first photodiodes. The first semiconductor substrate further comprises a second substrate, wherein at least one second photosensing portion is formed on a second surface of the second substrate, and the second substrate further comprises a plurality of second photodiodes arranged in a second pixel array and electrically connected to the first pixel array. At least one second channel selection transistor is electrically connected to the first channel selection transistors of the first photosensing portion. When the first photosensing portion and the second photosensing portion are formed together in the first and second substrate, the first photosensing portion and the second photosensing portion can be formed of a common photosensing material with the same resistivity or in a material having the same conductivity as the first substrate. Both the first channel selection transistor and the second channel selection transistor may be formed in the second substrate, thereby eliminating the need for a common gate pad or a common data pad. As a result, the manufacturing cost can be reduced. 79a2804d6b
