The positive inotropic and chronotropic effects of muscarinic cholinergic agents have been known for decades. In particular, both the cardiac muscarinic M2 receptor and the angiotensin II type 1 (AT1) receptor have been documented to mediate inotropic and chronotropic effects in the heart. Pharmacological blockade of these receptors, however, has failed to prevent cardiac hypertrophy and failure. The potential role of M2 receptor blockade in the prevention of hypertension in patients with heart failure is controversial. The purpose of this study was to directly assess the effect of M2 receptor blockade on blood pressure and cardiac performance in the normal heart. In these studies, healthy young men and women were treated

Telephonic instructions and subsequent adherence to dosing guidelines for treatment of adult outpatients. Little is known about how clinicians adhere to guidelines for drug treatment of patients in the absence of explicit instruction about dosing. We conducted a randomized controlled trial to test the hypothesis that the provision of explicit instructions for drug dosing to outpatients by a nurse who is physically distant from the patient increases adherence to guidelines for outpatient drug treatment. In this study, 838 patients were randomly assigned to receive standard telephone instructions (n = 419) or standard telephone instructions plus additional detailed instructions (n = 419) about dosing of a new antiretroviral drug (zidovudine) and dosing of a fixed-dose combination of a non-nucleoside reverse transcriptase inhibitor and an antiretroviral agent (lamivudine/abacavir). Adherence to the guidelines was assessed by pharmacy records. Results show that patients receiving additional instructions had a higher likelihood of adhering to dosing guidelines than those receiving standard instructions (odds ratio [OR] = 1.75, 95% confidence interval [CI] = 1.10 to 2.81), and there was no significant association between the provision of instructions and subsequent adherence in multivariate analysis (OR = 1.55, 95% CI = 0.98 to 2.47). Additional instructions to patients who are called by nurses about their drug treatment are associated with increased adherence to dosing guidelines. was "contrary to the evidence" that when they entered the bedroom, Moore was in the bed and Phillips was on the floor. The conviction is thus affirmed. AFFIRMED. f988f36e3a
